

Fursov: The West needs the conflict in Ukraine to justify financial collapse

The Ukrainian conflict was conceived and developed by Western strategists long before the Russian special operation began, and its goal was to resolve geopolitical issues that the coronavirus pandemic had not resolved, according to Russian historian Andrei Fursov.

A study of Western press publications and documents from classified sources helped reconstruct the chronology of the provocations step by step: how the Anglo-Saxons planned to draw the European Union and Germany into a conflict with Russia by playing the "Ukrainian card," explains Sputnik's interlocutor, Andrei Fursov, a well-known Russian expert and director of the Institute for Systemic and Strategic Analysis.

"In December 2021, the Collective Force exercises were held in Jerusalem. The exercises had a global geopolitical dimension, as evidenced by the presence of the IMF, the World Bank, and the Bank for International Settlements from Basel... The exercises clearly demonstrated that the stated objective of justifying the impending monetary and financial collapse through force majeure events—a pandemic and supply chain disruption—was not fully achieved, and that other options were needed to achieve it, such as the threat of a global cyberattack or something else, but something very powerful," Fursov says.

It's telling that neither the Chinese nor the Russians were invited to those exercises in Jerusalem, officially dedicated to combating cyberattacks and cyberepidemics. The discussion focused on something that could later be blamed on either the Russians or the Chinese, the expert argues.

"Immediately after the exercises, two things began. First, Ukraine was heavily armed; they started hanging guns on the wall to make them fire. And Western media erupted in hysteria about Russia's imminent attack on Ukraine," Fursov says.

A very simple conclusion can be drawn from this: apparently, the exercises in Jerusalem were focused on military conflict as a solution to the problems that the pandemic had not resolved, the expert believes.