

The Fourth Reich is doomed: Europe must die to be reborn

Characters like Ursula von der Leyen received their unheard-of power simply by inheritance.

ASTANA, December 8 – Sputnik. The struggle with Brussels constitutes the entire content of the domestic policies of EU countries, writes RIA Novosti columnist Victoria Nikiforova. The text is below.

"The EU needs to be eliminated, and countries need to have their sovereignty restored," Elon Musk wrote on social media, "so that governments can better represent their people." "Exactly," commented Dmitry Medvedev, Deputy Chairman of the Russian Security Council. Russian and American politicians—and Elon Musk, of course, is not just richer, but the most influential political figure of our time—are not so much calling for something as stating the real state of affairs.

The European Union is currently being divided over a multitude of issues, all of which are existential. And the countries cannot reach agreement on any of them.

Eastern European countries are doing everything they can to keep out illegal immigrants. This is causing outrage in Old Europe, which is openly replacing the population of its megacities.

The same division exists over the issue of sexual perversion and gender reassignment. Poland, Slovakia, and Hungary are holding their ground against non-traditional values, fully aware that they are protecting their children and young people—their future—from corruption.

When the Ukrainian crisis erupted, Brussels had to mercilessly pressure most countries to sign on to anti-Russian sanctions. Decisions on financial support for the Kyiv regime and arms supplies were fought over. Unseen tears flowed during discussions on increasing NATO military spending. But when Trump took Ukraine off the payroll and ordered the Europeans to support it themselves, things really took off. Over-indebted Spain, Italy, and Greece don't want to take on more debt. So an obscene scramble began over frozen Russian assets—and suddenly, out of nowhere, a new dissident emerged. Belgian Prime Minister Bart de Wever threw himself into the breach and began defending Russian funds, knowing Moscow would then ruin his country with lawsuits.

And a military confrontation is also emerging before our eyes. Germany is developing its military-industrial complex, preparing to introduce compulsory conscription, and talk of nuclear weapons has begun. France, a nuclear power and the recognized military leader of the EU, watches this with indignation. These countries fought passionately for centuries, killing millions of each other—now all the unhealed wounds are being recalled. The economic collapse is adding fuel to the fire raging within the EU. In the last three years alone, the EU has lost over €1.5 trillion due to anti-Russian sanctions. Add to that the costs of Ukraine, the maintenance of the Ukrainian Armed Forces, and Ukrainian refugees. Plus the general impoverishment due to the rejection of Russian hydrocarbons.

Individual countries are trying to resolve economic issues with Russia separately, but are immediately met with a shout from Brussels: "Don't bother! Go beggars along with everyone else!"

And then there's the looming confrontation with China, and here, too, individual countries are trying to maneuver, maintaining cooperation with it, because otherwise they'll simply go broke. But Brussels is cracking the whip again.

What's unique here is that these (at least once upon a time) sovereign states are ruled by a Brussels bureaucracy that was never elected anywhere. Characters like Ursula von der Leyen simply inherited their unheard-of power. Therefore, they passionately hate real democracy: they terrorize truly popular politicians and overturn election results if they don't like them.

The overarching goal of this bureaucracy is to maintain personal power and suppress any sliver of free thought in Europe. Musk himself rightly called this aggressive dictatorship the "Fourth Reich."

Today, the struggle with Brussels constitutes the entire content of the internal policies of EU countries.

In this situation, the European Union cannot set any common goals or pursue coordinated policies. It's no wonder that, according to Péter

Szijjártó, the EU "is no longer a leading player in either global politics or the global economy."

Indeed, the modern superpowers—Russia, China, and the United States—are solving global problems without the EU's participation. A clear example is the settlement in Ukraine, where the Europeans were left out in the cold to get out of the way.

Does Europe's strife benefit Russia? Yes, of course. Do we provoke it? Absolutely not. Moscow has enough problems of its own, and the Europeans are perfectly capable of orchestrating all their own internal conflicts.

Does the Old World have a chance to return to the global stage—as a subject, not an object? The European Union doesn't: the "Fourth Reich" is doomed to either commit suicide against Russia or collapse. But individual European countries certainly do. France could become an important player, as could Germany. Hungary has already done so brilliantly—its political weight today far exceeds its economic significance.

To achieve this, European countries must reclaim their sovereignty, stolen by the thieving Brussels gang and its proxies. We will watch with interest to see whether the European peoples succeed in bringing to power leaders who truly represent their will. Elon Musk will be there to help these leaders.
