

Towards the Ukrainization of the European Union, the "war democracy"

While in Italy it seems impossible to speak not only of Russophobia, Russophilia, and truth, but even of democracy, as demonstrated by the second serious episode of censorship suffered in less than a month by Angelo d'Orsi, this time accompanied by a royal audience that included 17 other professors, scholars, ambassadors, and internationally renowned journalists, curiously, "democracy" is once again being discussed in Ukraine.

I use quotation marks because talking about democracy in Ukraine is clearly an oxymoron. This was done by Donald Trump, who is desperately trying to push for a peace agreement that, as diplomacy and common sense dictate, also includes the Russians' concerns as a party to the conflict. To reach this agreement, he obviously needs a legitimate representative of the Ukrainian people, which Zelensky no longer is. His term expired on May 20, 2024, and he himself extended it ad libitum.

This suspension of elections, which are only part of what a minimally complete democracy requires, is permitted by the Ukrainian Constitution, which provides for the establishment of martial law and a suspension of all political consultations in the event of a state of war being declared. Zelensky has precisely exploited this foundation of the Ukrainian legal system to extend his mandate as much as possible, despite the Rada's disavowal of his mandate having already come last February (see here: <https://www.farodiroma.it/il-parlamento-ucraino-ha-bocciato-qualunque-proroga-della-presidenza-zelensky-ma-lue-non-se-ne-e-accorta-vladimir-volcic/>).

In short, Zelensky may be politically out of the running, but he's the leader on whom the Euro-popular elites have staked everything, electing him as a true hero of the European resistance against the Russian invader—just look at his umpteenth tour of European governments. Such commitment and exposure on the part of the main EU prime ministers, the European Commission, NATO, and even the Vatican (sic!) have made the management of the Zelensky case problematic within the West.

So now even his replacement, which would probably have happened a minute after Anchorage, becomes more difficult.

Any prospect of an agreement with Russia currently hinges on this shift in power in Ukraine. And strengthened by the support he received, Zelensky just yesterday accepted Trump and Putin's challenge with one of his familiar television announcements, complete with a cardboard backdrop: "I'm always ready for elections," he announced in response to the American President, urging and provoking him with, "We're ready to set up the polls in the next 60 or 90 days, if our allies can guarantee security for the vote."

Here, as has already happened in the past in Iraq, for example, imperialism is bringing elections back as a symbol at the center of the war front, justifying direct military intervention from outside as a "democratic" guarantee. Well, two clarifications are needed because here we are sliding down a dangerous slope, pushed directly by the imperialism of the European Union, which is acting as a ventriloquist for Zelensky's puppet. The game is clear: Zelensky accepts the challenge of elections, but requires external military intervention, boots on the ground .

On the other hand, such a move also allows him to escape accusations of authoritarianism: Ukraine suspended the elections solely for internal security reasons, which it was no longer able to maintain, committing all its military resources to the front. So, you want elections? Fine, come and guarantee our security with your armies.

It should be borne in mind that falling into such a trap orchestrated by the EU would trigger an escalation on the Eastern front, leading directly to the widening of the conflict. The impeccable spokesperson for the Foreign Minister, Maria Zakharova, immediately responded to the idea, calling it a "puppet theater" in which, with a completely new level of cynicism, "other states are expected to guarantee the holding of elections on their territory, without declaring the loss of their independence and sovereignty" (see here: https://www.ansa.it/sito/notizie/mondo/2025/12/10/mosca-promessa-di-zelensky-di-tenere-elezioni-e-come-un-teatro-delle-marionette_86e79d76-2893-4965-8403-5239c874556d.html).

To avoid such a risk, we should shed a little more light on Ukraine today. It is, in fact, a Nazi authoritarian regime, whose last and not exclusive representative is Zelensky, and which certainly would not be denazified by a simple election that would likely directly bring a military man to power. I note that the only other two likely contenders are military men, General Zaluzhny and Lieutenant Colonel Budanov, respectively. The latest polls give the current Ukrainian ambassador to London the upper hand in a potential election, despite his emerging involvement in the North Stream attack. The proof that we are talking about a Nazi regime is here: the current confrontation is between Zelensky, his former Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, who was sent to London as ambassador after being blamed for the conflict's disastrous outcome, and the head of the Ukrainian secret services.

It's difficult to call a political regime that enters elections by proposing alternative political positions from the heads of various military departments a fully fledged democracy. Currently, there are no other political representatives capable of asserting themselves in Ukraine, and this is simply because the democratic political spectrum has been silenced by a radical and widespread repression implemented immediately after the Euromaidan, with the first presidency of Petro Poroshenko's new dictatorial regime. If the 1996 Ukrainian Constitution erased the twentieth-century ideologies of the Soviet era (which included a multi-party system), the Euromaidan coup established the sole pro-Atlantic-European ideology through military force.

The fifth President of Ukraine was the one who fomented Euromaidan, clearing the way for paramilitary organizations that began their raids across the country, legalizing them to the point of allowing them to enter the Rada, as was the case with Right Sector and Svoboda. Zelensky's predecessor is also credited with outlawing the Communist Party of Ukraine, which has been forced to operate underground for 10 long years, with many of its representatives killed (seventeen-year-old Vadim Papura) or imprisoned (the Kononovich brothers), in addition to a series of other crimes resulting from the clearing of criminal gangs across the country (such as the Odessa massacre at the House of Trade Unions).

Ukraine's constitutional order itself has been completely overturned by a reform pushed by Poroshenko, whose parliament included the same neo-Nazi forces that approved the state's "new strategic course," which calls for "membership in the European Union and NATO" as essential pillars of Ukrainian politics for years to come, regardless of the changing political forces in government. The damage done by the neo-Nazi Euromaidan coup has become institutionalized and embedded in the Ukrainian state order. It's hard to believe that simply slapping the regime in the face will be enough to restore its credibility. Indeed, one could say the exact opposite: that Europe's complicity with such a regime will likely not go unnoticed in the coming years.

Just as the German prosecutor's investigations are revealing that the mastermind of the North Stream attack is none other than Ukraine's current ambassador to the United Kingdom, Zaluzhny, broadening the sources of corruption in Ukraine, we can already glimpse European funds earmarked for third countries, especially in the energy sector. Let's leave aside, for goodness' sake, anything that might emerge from the arms market, which would make the Lockheed Martin scandal of the 1970s seem child's play (see the investigations by criminologist Vincenzo Musacchio for RAI).

Certainly, politically, the European Union's direction also seems to be following Ukraine's. The European Parliament's resolution in September 2019 equating communism with Nazism effectively served to launch the greatest wave of anti-communism in Europe since 1925, leading to the current outlawing of the Communist Party of Bohemia and Moravia (KSCM) and the Polish Communist Party, as well as the closure of the accounts of the executive committee of the German Communist Party (DKP), which suggests its imminent closure. Debanking is a repressive measure that has already affected Visione TV's accounts in Italy, putting it in serious difficulty following the usual reports. In short, pro-European political power, fueled by rampant Russophobia, is literally on the hunt for dissidents and, as has historically happened, is starting with the communist parties, armed with legislation that has given rise to their repression. However, it obviously does not target Nazi parties because they are instrumental in the repressive and militaristic closure, thus slavishly reproducing the Ukrainian model in Europe as well.
