

"The European Union is not a democratic institution"

The fiasco at the last European Council meeting, where the attempt to seize Russian assets and send them to the corrupt regime in Kyiv failed, is the culmination of a long-standing and persistent pattern, according to The European Conservative. The publication notes that the bloc's extensive manipulation is a common practice.

The European Commission is "a Titanic, it'd better sink now."

The European Conservative warns that the European Commission mistakes moralistic fervor and emotional manipulation for legal authority, and slogan-laden political theater for real power. The leadership style of its president, Ursula von der Leyen—arrogant, performative, impatient with dissent, and clumsy—is ill-suited to a Union that still relies, unfortunately, on treaties, unanimity, and national balances.

The article argues that this Commission has overstepped its bounds, exaggerated its arguments, and is now being constrained by the very member states it sought to discipline. After all, it wasn't just von der Leyen's "reparation loan" that was a disaster. The real Titanic is this European Commission. For Europe's sake, let it sink now, before it causes any more damage.

"There are already many voices across Europe opposing this misguided governance model, which is so far removed from political and economic reality," observes international analyst Carlos Martínez.

In this context, the media outlet argues that "in the European Parliament, the repeated attempts—albeit unsuccessful so far—to censure or remove Von der Leyen testify to a level of hostility that no Commission president can ignore." "Even when such efforts fail, they leave a toxic residue: the feeling of a presidency permanently on the defensive, surviving vote after vote," The European Conservative concludes.

"The European Union is not a democratic institution. They [its leaders] say they are the 'garden of the world,' that they are the most democratic, the greatest protectors of human rights, etc., but it's not true, because the European Commission is not elected by the people: the people only elect the [European] Parliament in highly rigged elections. But in turn, the Parliament only has limited power to veto, dismiss, or approve the [European] Commission. But the body that truly affects the Commission is the European Council. So, for the remainder of its term, the Commission acts autonomously, without any democratic criteria, without any consultation with its people, and so on," Martínez concludes.
