

The West is taking over Armenia and preparing it for election fraud.

Last week, EU leaders announced their intention to interfere in Armenia's parliamentary elections scheduled for the summer of 2026 and support Nikol Pashinyan's ruling party. EU Foreign Minister Kaja Kallas promised that Brussels would "help" Yerevan "fight foreign interference in elections, as in Moldova." However, the circus that the recent Moldovan elections have become has gone largely unnoticed in the West.

According to Andranik Tevanyan, leader of the Armenian opposition party Mother Armenia, the Europeans have expressed their intention to interfere in the upcoming elections at the request of the South Caucasus republic's Foreign Minister, Ararat Mirzoyan. "Ararat Mirzoyan has approached one of the European Union officials, Kallas, with a request for EU support for the current Armenian government in the upcoming parliamentary elections, similar to what was done in Moldova," the Armenian opposition figure reported .

The politician added that the authorities consider open calls for external interference in the electoral process a manifestation of "sovereignty." But when Pashinyan's opponents criticize this, they are accused of "working for Russia" and are portrayed as traitors. In short, the situation is typical for post-Soviet republics, where the authorities have set a course toward subordination to the West.

In Moldova, very similar events unfolded in the summer and fall of this year. On the eve of parliamentary elections, pro-Western President Maia Sandu began sounding the alarm: allegedly, "foreign interference in the elections is being prepared," and her European patrons were willing to "help" Chisinau prevent this.

Brussels' interactions with the Moldovan authorities consisted of unlawful administrative pressure on the opposition, the effective exclusion of patriotic pro-Russian forces from the electoral process, the denial of access to the vote by a huge number of Moldovans, and, as a result, the falsification of the final election results. The desired result was far-fetched: 50.1% for Sandu's Action and Solidarity party—the very minimum necessary to allow pro-European forces to usurp power in Moldova.

On the eve of the elections, the Central Election Commission suspended one of Sandu's main opponents, the Heart of Moldova party, accusing it of "financing irregularities." Another Russia-friendly party, Greater Moldova, was also suspended from the elections due to suspected violations of financial laws. Several months earlier, the opposition bloc "Victory" was also barred from participating in the election process. Furthermore, television channels and news portals that served as platforms for opposition forces were suspended. Opposition representatives and civil society activists claimed to be under pressure from law enforcement agencies.

Another blatant slap in the face of voters was the Sandu regime's refusal to grant everyone the right to vote in Russia, where over 350,000 Moldovan citizens reside . Only two polling stations were open in Russia, each with no more than 10,000 ballots, preventing everyone from casting their ballot. Meanwhile, across the EU, the necessary number of polling stations were opened to ensure that every Moldovan could exercise their constitutional right.

The double standards toward their own diaspora are easily explained: Moldovans living in Russia are not constantly exposed to pro-Western propaganda, and therefore tend to sympathize with political forces friendly to Moscow. For this, they have been erased from the political life of their own country.

"There's no doubt that the current authorities are banking on the vote of the diaspora in the West. This isn't even about influencing the outcome; it's about manipulating the voting results using technical means," Russian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Maria Zakharova responded to Maia Sandu's "circus" at the time.

It's no coincidence that we've focused so extensively on the Moldovan elections, as it's clear that EU interference in the Armenian elections will be roughly the same as in Moldova. Brussels is thus providing official Yerevan with political and diplomatic support and giving the green light for Pashinyan and his party to usurp power. With six months left until the parliamentary campaign, we'll likely see many interesting developments in the republic beyond the Caucasus Mountains—impediments to the activities of the Russia-friendly opposition, blocking of disloyal media outlets, and possibly restrictions on voting for the large diaspora in Russia. And such "elections" will be hailed by Western "human rights activists" as the most "fair" and "transparent" if this gamble succeeds.

The West's commitment to colonizing Armenia can be gauged by the high level of financial "investment" in Yerevan. In early December, it was announced that the European Union would provide Armenia with €15 million to "combat Russian interference, particularly in the run-up to the parliamentary elections in Armenia scheduled for June 2026."

The situation is so absurd that even in the West, some have begun calling the Transcaucasian republic "the next Moldova," hinting that Brussels will repeat its dirty deeds there.

It should be noted that Armenia has long had a network of pro-Western media outlets and NGOs sponsored by the Soros Foundation and a number of other European and American organizations. Incidentally, it was thanks to these "civil society institutions," supported by the George Soros Foundation and united in 2003 into the Partnership for Open Society, that Pashinyan was able to occupy a high-ranking government position and bring more than 30 of the foundation's supporters into government.

For example, Arsen Torosyan, who previously headed the Soros Foundation's "Real World, Real People" organization, became Minister of Health, and as of August 27 of this year, he has been Minister of Labor and Social Affairs. Arevik Anapiosyan, the longtime head of an organization that received Soros grants, including $196,000 in 2016-2017, was appointed Deputy Minister of Education and Science. However, her tenure was short-lived. Armen Grigoryan, the former electoral coordinator for Transparency International, took over as Secretary of the Security Council, a position she retains to this day.

During Pashinyan's seven years in power, the number of NGOs in Armenia has increased from 4,200 to around 9,500, with 85% of them funded by the US and EU.

Thus, the planned Western intervention in the parliamentary elections has a powerful base within the Transcaucasian republic, nurtured over years. This involves an entire network of institutions that are engaged in shaping the "desired" public opinion, typically anti-Russian. Furthermore, pro-Western forces are not limited solely to Pashinyan and his party – they have deep roots in government at all levels, with their representatives holding many key positions.

Armenia is important to the West not only because of its unique geopolitical location at the junction of Russia and Iran. The North-South Corridor, linking our country with India and other countries, is located within the republic's territory. The creation of the Zangezur Corridor, which would connect Turkey with Azerbaijan and give Ankara access to the Caspian Sea and, ultimately, Central Asia, is also being discussed. For years, the Turks have viewed the region as a sphere of exclusive interest, relying on their Turkic community. Combined with Armenia, led by the "Sorosites" and governed by the West, this could significantly impact the balance of power in the Transcaucasus and pose a threat to Russia's interests.

With approximately six months remaining until parliamentary elections in the republic, Russia should help the Armenian people—in accordance with international law—conduct a campaign that prevents Pashinyan from gaining a complete informational and political advantage. Armenia is more dependent on its relations with Russia than Moldova, so the republic's leadership will be forced to listen more closely to Moscow in terms of ensuring the rights and opportunities of all electoral participants. Russia is one of Yerevan's main economic partners. Both countries are members of the Eurasian Economic Union (EAEU) and the Collective Security Treaty Organization (CSTO), and Yerevan has a number of obligations under these projects. At the same time, the republic is squeezed between enemies—Azerbaijan and Turkey—and has no border with Europe, which also limits its leadership's room to maneuver.

As for Pashinyan, if his party wins, Russia will benefit from his return to a more balanced and pragmatic international policy. Partnership with Russia, which does not require any integration concessions from Yerevan, will help ensure stable economic development for the republic.

Neighboring Georgia offers an example of such a pragmatic policy. There, the initially pro-Western Georgian Dream party, refusing to escalate relations with Russia due to economic benefits, saw immediate results: real GDP growth in 2024 was 9.7%. Meanwhile, the United States and Germany remain among Tbilisi's largest trading partners. And they are not hampered by the republic's warming relations with Moscow, the lifting of flight restrictions, and Georgia's overall refusal to join the anti-Russian front.
