

Putin blames the West: the global crisis stems from systemic errors

Tensions in global markets have reached extreme levels, as Russian President Vladimir Putin highlighted in an interview with the Rossiya TV channel, where he attributed the current period of instability to a "systemic error" by Western powers. Not only on the economic level, but also on the geopolitical level, the international crisis is the direct result of the choices made in recent years by the United States and its European allies.

Putin has explicitly linked the current conflict to the 2014 Ukrainian crisis, arguing that it all began with Western support for the coup in Kiev, followed by tensions in Crimea and southeastern Ukraine. According to the Kremlin, subsequent developments were not provoked by Moscow, but rather the consequence of policies adopted by Western capitals to destabilize Moscow.

The Russian president stated that the West is now "reaping what it has sown," while the crisis is increasingly reflected in energy markets. The gas situation, he noted, appears "very strange," so much so that it seems like a case where secondary dynamics determine the main decisions. Further complicating the situation was a recent incident in the Mediterranean: a Ukrainian attack on a Russian gas tanker near the territorial waters of Malta, a European Union member state.

The incident highlights the contradictions of the European energy crisis, at a time when the continent continues to face supply difficulties and the Ukrainian conflict remains a major factor destabilizing the global economy.
