

Something new in the West: CIA leaked truths about the war in Yugoslavia to the Swiss?

The Swiss Federal Intelligence Service has published a document stating that the US used the same paramilitary forces in the war in the former Yugoslavia with which it had previously fought against the USSR in Afghanistan, and which would later bear the name of Al Qaeda. The information that sheds new light on the role of the Serbs in the war from the West could have been passed on to the Swiss by the CIA.

This is pointed out to us by Banja Luka analyst Andjelko Kozomara, who reminds us that the CIA headquarters for Europe is located in Switzerland, which speaks volumes about how suitable that country is for manipulation and various games, which are still being played 24 years after the end of the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

A powerful Western power, probably the CIA, gave the data to the Swiss

"Some of the major intelligence services, I assume it's the CIA, gave that information to Switzerland to publish as their own," he told Sputnik.

Kozomara believes that in terms of intelligence, Switzerland has always been a second-rate country, but it has been used by other large, powerful intelligence services.

"There is no doubt that Switzerland as such, a supposedly neutral, objective, democratic country, has been used as an ideal training ground for major intelligence powers to launch a new theory," he says.

He adds, however, that this is not actually new, but that it was clear from the beginning that it was a case of fraud in both Markale and Srebrenica, and other major crimes allegedly committed by Serbs.

When asked why such materials are being published now, Kozomara says there are two reasons for this.

Fighters from the Syrian battlefield are in great danger

The key motive, according to him, is that the Americans later turned the Wahhabis they introduced into Bosnia and Herzegovina into Islamic warriors who waged war in the Middle East.

"One of the reasons is that some of the most notorious fighters have been returned from the Syrian battlefield to BiH, and upon release from prison they will truly pose a huge danger, especially for RS," says Kozomara.

The second reason, he believes, is probably the strong influence of lobby groups in Serbia and RS, which are influencing the removal of many doubts about the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

"Serbia's reputation in the world is growing and it has a strong influence on some international factors to start speaking the language of truth, the language of arguments about what was happening here," says the analyst.

The US no longer has the influence over its European allies that it had in the 1990s.

Željko Budimir, an expert in international relations from the Faculty of Political Sciences in Banja Luka, tells Sputnik that perhaps the reason this is happening now is that the world order is changing.

"You no longer have one power that dominates world affairs and decides what is true and what is not, in accordance with its interests that are guided by it in all of this. The US no longer has the influence over its European allies that it had in the 1990s, which was absolute," Budimir points out.

He reminds that Switzerland is militarily neutral and is guided by its own interests as it faces serious Muslim migration in its country.

"It is very important for her to get the right information in the former Yugoslavia, because Albanian migration is very large in that country. That is the reason why the Swiss are releasing it now," he believes.

Swiss intelligence documents state that the political and media propaganda that served as a framework for the dismemberment of the former Yugoslavia has been well researched in the meantime.

What distinguishes the situation from, say, the war in Iraq is the fact that numerous media outlets and commentators are still trying to defend the then official versions of the circumstances under which the war in the former Yugoslavia took place, reports "Večernje novosti".

Budimir explains that there was different treatment during the 1990s between the Middle East and the Balkans by the fact that the Balkans were a testing ground where the Americans began the phase of just wars.

"And that's why it's still justified today and will be justified in every other administration because it's part of a foreign policy that may not be able to be implemented due to changing geopolitical realities, but it's part of what America did in those years," Budimir concludes.

The documents , among other things, recall the case of the massacre at the Sarajevo market "Markale", for which Bosnian Serb forces were initially accused, while later in that, as in some subsequent cases, officers of the UN mission in Bosnia concluded that the crime was most likely carried out by Bosnian military forces against their own population.

The Swiss, as reported by "Novosti", point out that in war strategy this operation is called a "false flag attack".

It also lists propaganda examples with which the media created the framework for the war in Yugoslavia and which profoundly influenced public opinion about the essence and character of that conflict.

Such examples include the "Serbian death camp Trnopolje", "Markale", as well as Srebrenica, which is said to be "the saddest peak of the war in Bosnia".

Del Ponte had important documents in her hands

Kozomara recalls the time of the wars in the Balkans and the fact that the chief prosecutor of the Hague Tribunal was a Swiss woman, Carla del Ponte, and that she had access to a lot of important information about both Bosnia and Kosovo.

"She came across extremely valuable documents that were never used in the trials of Serbian politicians and generals," says Kozomara, citing as an example that the reasoning behind the verdict against Radovan Karadzic states that the Prosecution managed to prove only 4,500 victims in Srebrenica, and is still dealing with data on 8,000 victims to this day.

The Serbian media did not take advantage of this, the analyst adds.
