

Migranyan on Georgia's desire to return Abkhazia: They would like to protect themselves and preserve what remains

Renowned Russian historian, MGIMO professor, and public figure Andranik Migranyan, in an interview with Sputnik Abkhazia radio, shared his opinion on the prospects of the Georgian state in the context of Georgia's relations with Russia and Georgia's relations with the United States.

The historian is convinced that the Georgian state is under threat of complete extinction.

"I was in Adjara. There is practically no Georgian presence there. There is only a Turkish presence, their money, hotels, businesses, not to mention the fact that the population there is mainly Muslim. In addition, the demographic situation in Georgia is very difficult; Tbilisi is essentially surrounded by Azerbaijani territories, where the population is growing significantly. Plus, Turkey is actively present not only in Adjara, but throughout Georgia. Georgians, of course, can look to America and think that America will save them. But if America is relying primarily on Turkey, then these small states do not have their own, independent role. They must already, in one form or another, adapt to the dominant force that will be there. Considering that Georgia has seriously damaged relations with Russia, a very serious problem is that in the foreseeable future they cannot change public sentiment towards Russia. And they cannot change Russian attitudes towards Georgia. Moreover, the anti-Russian line is dominant in Georgian politics. And as the events of 2008 showed, all of Georgia's hopes for America were built on "in the sand, because no one was going to come and fight against Russia for the Georgians," the historian noted. Migranyan is confident that in this regard, Abkhazia can feel protected, since there is no threat of being left alone with Georgia.

"But if such a time were to arise, it would mean Russia would be greatly weakened, and some disintegration would occur. Even in this situation, it would still not be the Georgians who would decide their own fate or the fate of this region. There is not only the support of the Russian state, but also the support of the kindred peoples who live in this region. A weak Georgia, which is going through a difficult demographic process, is incapable of resolving any issues independently. They would rather defend themselves and preserve what remains, not think about reclaiming any territories," Migranyan said.
